a grant for their new law center which officially opened April 18, 1994. The Community Law Center coordinates for elderly law, domestic relations, and drug abuse.

In the area of drug nuisance abatement, we have just successfully assisted the community in getting a boarded-up building, which had a flor-eshing liquor store, demolished,” said Lee Gaedicke, staff attorney. The liquor store was a drug “hot spot” and the court order in back was being used to “chop” stolen cars. The law center will be celebrating their victory and removing new faces for the now vac-ant lot with the community in the near future.

C.A.R.P.L.S., the Coordinated Advice & Referral Project for Legal Services, also opened its doors this year. Funded by the Lawyers, Trust and the Illinois and Chicago Bar Foundations, the agency is a response to the increasing number of poor people in the Chicago area who need legal advice and referral. All major legal service providers are part of C.A.R.P.L.S.’s network. Whenever someone calls the “wrong” agency— e.g. an agency that is not able to re- spond to the client’s question or service need—the agency can then transfer the caller directly to C.A.R.P.L.S. for immediate assistance. C.A.R.P.L.S., staff, who are all lawyers, will either work with the client or direct them to an appropriate agency. The program is already responding to over 2,500 calls a month and has drawn national attention as a model program for meeting legal needs.

C.B.F. Staffs Activities to Examine “Family Court” Possibilities

The Need: Lost Opportunities During The Out-Of-School Hours

According to the Carnegie Council on Adolescent Development, each school day, America’s 20 million young ad-olescents decide how they will spend at least five (40%) of their waking hours when they are not in school. For many of these hours, they spend both risk and opportunity. On weekends and during the summer months, American youth have even greater amounts of discretionary time.

Research conducted by the Chapin Hall Center for Children at the University of Chicago concludes that “It is imperative that society provide opportunities through which children can build the capacities and skills they need to function adequately as young people and later as adults.” And that “over the long term, particularly for school-age and older children, the potential for social participation is often what sustains a child’s effort to overcome obstacles.”

In Chicago, well over 100 programs have identified mentoring as a means to deliver this kind of opportunity to inner city children. Some are doing a spectacular job. Others struggle to recruit and retain volunteer talent and funding. All of them welcome new resources for capacity building and fund-raising.

An Answer: The Lead A Hand Program

After-school, tutoring/mentoring programs, where children meet in one-on-one and group programs with committed adult partners, are a key means to success for at-risk young people. The Chicago Bar Foundation, in collabora tion with the Tutor Mentor Connection of Cabrini Connections, is committed to expanding the availability of such programs in Chicago.

The Lead A Hand Program was launched by the CBA President Tom Domenico in 1992. Its original purpose was to encourage lawyers and other professionals to become mentors for troubled children. The program has expanded in conjunction with selected youth service programs to recruit volunteers and help to develop program activities. Currently, we are placing approximately 25 volunteers a month with qualified programs. This year, we inaugurated the Demetrio Award to acknowledge an exemplary program. The Award—a $2,000 cash prize and commemorative sculpture—was presented to the Ariil Foundation “I Have A Dream” program.

Because they are early intervention programs, mentoring programs are relatively cost-effective ways to give children the support they need. Now that we are committed to the concept, our goal is to raise $250,000 for distribution to qualified tutor/mentoring programs throughout Chicago.

Through systematic funding of start-ups and on-going programs, the Lead A Hand Fund would give children the tools they need to avoid academic and social problems. The Fund’s highest priority is the support of after-school, site-based tutor/mentor programs which offer a mixture of academic tutoring and one-on-one mentoring on an ongoing basis. In such programs, students usually meet at a central site and participate for at least one year.

The Lead A Hand Fund would be guided by an Advisory Board made up of representatives from the legal and educational communities, as well as program practitioners. The Foundation is working with the Tutor Mentor Connection, a citywide network of programs, to ensure that our guidelines identify and promote “what works” for attracting, retaining and succeeding with young people, volunteers and staff.

Our Justice for Youth Campaign has been studying ways to better coordinate services and reduce the amount of time spent on unproductive, needlessly adversarial practices in the Juvenile Court. This leads us to investigating the use of unified family courts in other states and cities around the United States.

We produced a summary of our findings and joined with the Northwestern University Children’s Family Justice Center in co-sponsoring two seminars intended to create dialogue among family’s strengths and weaknesses. In April, the University of Illinois at Chicago committed to working with us in designing a model fami-
